Persona Helper

Personally, SANS offers a course called SANS Security 504: Hacker Techniques, Exploits, and Incident Handling. Perhaps you are convinced you need one or the other course because of your duties in incident handling or penetration testing.

Perhaps your next step is building a business case for SEC560 as it relates to your vulnerability management programs? With corporate training and travel budgets being limited, workers in the trenches are often forced to build detailed business case justifications for travel and training. Perhaps, a quick slide deck, or well crafted email, doesn't cut it any more. Companies want a good ROI for sending us. There are three basic areas that need to be addressed in your business justification, people, process and technology, so let's get started.

People. Who do we select for training as a penetration tester? Clearly, someone with that job duty and/or the job duty of overseeing an outside Pen Test. We recommend that you always have someone shadowing an outside pen test group. Not everyone is appropriate for penetration testing training. This is very technical, very hands on. It requires knowledge of more than one operating system and comfort with command lines. If we do not send the right person for penetration testing training, we do not get the anticipated benefits. Who do we select for training in hacker techniques and incident handling? This is also fairly technical, but there is a lot of process. Many organizations have sent the
